

The Circle of Glory illustrates how every legitimate field of education is a reflection of God's invisible character. The Triune God who manifests absolute Goodness, absolute Truth, and absolute Beauty, reflects Himself in the world around us. Since human nature is drawn to and fascinated by God's Glory, this natural hunger could be harnessed by our schools and universities as the great, motivating "Why?" of learning. This understanding would return us to the foundation of Truth itself, and unleash fresh meaning to everything we do

I grew up in a time when we were taught to pursue education because we would find a better job if we were educated. A pretty lame excuse at best, not to mention it's not necessarily true anymore. How much better if we were challenged to educate ourselves because of a love for the goodness, truth, and beauty revealed in our Maker. Goodness would teach us how to live, Truth would set us free, and Beauty would elevate our souls, fill our hearts and fuel our passions.

As a college student and a new Believer I had little interest in learning. Government, history, philosophy, and literature were not likely to help me find a better job, so why bother with the investment? But when I became a student of the Kingdom my hunger for learning experienced a virtual Renaissance. Each of these studies reflected fascinating aspects of the Triune God, and called my heart towards a deeper life.
